I'm ignorant on this process. Do the Dems cast their ballot now to refute the GOP electors?

From what I'm gathering, this basically extends the election and make Mike Pence the final arbiter.

Think about it like the democrats are saying "these are the electors" and the republicans are saying "no these are it" and Mike Pence gets to choose who's telling the truth. Now that we have this situation in Pennsylvania, Georgia and Nevada (and counting) I think that puts Trump over the 270 mark needed to win.

It least that's what I'm grasping at this point. Hope that helped some.

I don't believe this is true, and I've been trying to find someone to tell me how I'm wrong, because I'd like to be. But the Electoral Count Act states that in the case of disputed electors that can't be resolved by the House and Senate agreeing on which to use (which they won't), then they choose the state-certified electors. Which would be Biden's.

I honestly don't think Pence gets a say in it, unless I'm misreading the law. Someone can tell me if I'm missing something, but the law clearly states how to handle this, and the VP doesn't seem to have a role.

The only way is for a court to de-certify the Biden slate of electors in these states. GOP electors can't just simply cast a vote for the president and then have the Vice President pick them.

This is why the Trump legal team was trying so hard to stop certification, because if they did that first, and THEN this happened, yes, it would go to Pence. That's not the case, only a court decertifying the vote would allow that.

The Dem set of votes can be more easily dismissed now that the GOP elector votes have been cast

Here's where Pence would get a say:

- State sends certified electors for Biden
- GOP sends uncertified electors for Trump
- Before the electors are counted, a court order de-certifies the Biden electors.
- Now there are 2 uncertified electors to count. So Pence chooses the Trump ones.
- In the House, Pelosi chooses the Biden electors even though they've been decertified.
- Without an agreement between houses, neither are counted

If that happens with enough states to take away Biden's 270, it will go to House delegation, where Trump will win.

I think Pence gets a say in it. I'm watching this RSBN. Read Kennedy with Nixon in 1960 regarding Hawaii. Rudy said the same thing too

Even better than 1960 is 1876. Things were about as messed up then as now (minus the Communism). VP plays a role as it is ill-defined. This guy has a solid lay out of how things work.

I'm just taking a straight read of the law.

And I'm not going to lie, I'd love for Rudy to have found something that will knock the courts around a bit, but I'm not super confident in much beyond his enthusiasm to win as far as Rudy goes. He's been loyal to Trump, but we haven't gotten too much mileage out of that guy as far as real progress.

The Hawaii case is only going to be comparable if the governors of these contested states also put their signature and seal on the GOP electoral votes AS WELL as the Biden votes they've already marked up. That's the reason that this case comes up, because it provided an exception to the law I'm talking about, since there were TWO sets of state-certified electors, which means the law couldn't apply in that case.

In our case, the only electors that will meet this state-certified criterion are Bidens. The GOP legislature electors will not have that certification, and therefore won't get the same legal consideration when the law clearly states that they should be ignored if the Senate and House don't both agree to use them.

Yes, but Pence being President of the Senate means he has a say so when it comes to the Senate choosing electors from states with disputed election results.

We're talking about the feds, not state legislatures, on Jan 6.

If there are two sets of electors, the House and Senate must both agree which to use. If they can't, then the state-certified electors are used. The state governments don't really have a part in this.

Jan 3. Don't think that's going to change how this plays out, though. There is no real chance any Dems are going to go rogue to help Trump take a state. The court wins have given them plenty of cover there regardless of anything but the most catastrophically incriminating of evidence.

States send electors. In a contested election, states send two sets (like this). VP chooses what set to open.

Deep state, CCP and DNC are leaning on pence, likely threatening his life or kids to let biden win. It will take a massive show of armed support from Pedes to help him choose.

Dual slates of electors in PA, GA, WI, NV and hopefully AZ and MI. MI are being "blocked" access to Capital if that makes a difference, dunno... they should meet privately anyway. WI Court rulings put state in play anyway. Landmark day- keep the faith, media will be bonkers for ChinaJoeBiden...

Question here. Is Nevada sending two sets of electors like GA, WI, etc, or did Nevada actually say, with all the evidence of fraud, when you remove the fraudulent votes, Trump wins and we award him our full set of electors unconditionally?

It could still matter if a court order comes down before the votes are counted to decertify the dem votes. That's why Trump tried so hard to stop the electors from getting certified in the first place.

It was an uphill battle before. Now it's going to be like rock climbing.
